Esophagus and Heartburn

After you chew your food and swallow, it travels through the esophagus, the tube that connects your mouth to your stomach.

The walls of the esophagus are muscles that propel the food downward. Functioning normally, they are unaffected by gravity. Even if you stand on your head, the esophagus, if working properly, will still push food "downward." At the bottom of the esophagus is a muscular valve that opens to the stomach. This valve contracts after food passes through, to keep it in the stomach as digestion continues. Sometimes, however, the valve doesn't function properly, and the stomach's contents and acid "splash" up on the esophagus.

In cases of heartburn, stomach acid splashes up onto the esophagus, giving the telltale irritable or "burning" sensation of heartburn. Chronic irritation of the esophagus caused by heartburn can lead to more serious health conditions later on.

Heartburn can have many different causes:

- Eating a big meal right before bedtime: That midnight snack might seem like a good idea at the time, but it can lead to a very restless night. Before running to the fridge for a late-evening binge, consider that lying down too soon after eating is a good way to get heartburn, especially if you're already prone to it. Remember, heartburn occurs when stomach acid splashes up onto the esophagus—even when you're sitting up. So, eating late and night and then lying down for some shuteye almost guarantees a case of heartburn. At that point,

Digestive Health

Enzymatic Therapy's heritage is rooted in the digestive health category and based on the belief that a healthy digestive system is crucial to overall health. A healthy digestive system not only helps us feel more comfortable but also enables our bodies to absorb the nutrients we need to live.

With busy, stress-filled days and on-the-go meals being the norm for many of us, it's no wonder that our digestive systems are not always functioning as well as they should be. While we encourage everybody to try to eat right and tone down the stress in their lives, we know that it's not always that easy.

For those whose digestive systems could use a little support on a regular basis or just every so often, Enzymatic Therapy offers a range of products to help manage everything from occasional heartburn to gas and bloating. There are also products that promote and maintain regularity and others which increase the "good bacteria" in the intestines.

So whether you are looking for information on detoxification or simply want to know what may be causing your occasional heartburn, the Enzymatic Therapy Digestive Resource center is here to provide information.

March: Flatulence—The Thunder from Down Under

Although flatulence is much beloved by eight-year-old boys everywhere, it's not so popular in the grown-up universe. Everybody's had what you'd call an "elevator moment." Those times are embarrassing enough, but they're especially tough when you can't blame the dog.

Flatulence—farting, as it's popularly known—occurs for everyone on an average of 14 times a day. Whether we're aware of it or not, gas happens—even in our sleep.

But what causes this bodily music? Flatus—the gas itself, is the result of food arriving in the

Before you reach for the cup of coffee to kick-start your day, spend some time thinking about why it is that you "need" that coffee to get going in the first place. If you are like more than half of adults, you have less energy than you did five years ago and you are trying to make up for it with caffeine or other artificial stimulants to get you through the day.

Enzymatic Therapy offers a range of natural, healthy solutions to help you feel more energized from tips on eating and sleeping to products which provide the nutritional support your body needs for optimal vitality. We encourage you to take charge of your energy and do all you can to regain your vitality in a healthy, natural way.

February: Stress Management 101

In February it becomes hard to keep up with those resolutions that we made in January, and vow once and for all to lose that weight, exercise every day, or stop eating junk food. While we know these are achievable goals, our inability to meet them year after year can make us feel like failures. Well, maybe it's not us. Maybe it's the resolutions that are to blame.

Exciting new research has found that stress may be the cause of unhealthy habits. How we personally respond to stress can cause weight gain, fatigue, and those insatiable cravings for sugar, salt, fat, and alcohol. And vowing to reduce the amount of stress we experience each day just might be a far superior resolution. However, that's obviously

Heart Disease

Many of us are trying to lead healthy lifestyles but all too often poor diets, high stress and lack of exercise get in the way. The good news is that we have the power to control many of these factors by taking steps toward a healthier lifestyle and a more positive outlook on life. It's not always easy to make lifestyle changes, but doing so is crucial to your health, well being and quality of life.

Eliminating tobacco products, adding exercise to our routines several days a week and striving to eat a healthy, balanced diet are all important places to start. Also, taking heart healthy supplements can help maintain a healthy
